WHEREAS, In 1955, Guthrie was hired by the California Division of Forestry and began working at the Lake Elsinore Station; and

WHEREAS, Guthrie and his crew were sent off of the main road about a mile east of El Cariso Village into a canyon to start setting backfires and the shifting winds soon pushed a wall of flame back up the canyon toward their truck; and

WHEREAS, With the flames advancing on them, Guthrie ordered the other firefighters back to the truck for protection, thus saving their lives, despite the fact that there was not room in the truck for him; and

WHEREAS, Guthrie attempted to use a firehose to wet himself down for protection, but the firehose was burned beyond use; and

WHEREAS, Twenty-seven other firefighters were injured fighting the 1,700-acre blaze, some losing ears, fingers, and noses; and

WHEREAS, Guthrie, with over 85 percent of his body burned, began walking out of the canyon before others came to his aid and an ambulance arrived to take him to the closest hospital, which was located in Hemet; and

WHEREAS, Guthrie finally succumbed to his injuries at Redland's hospital on September 14, 1959; and

WHEREAS, Guthrie left behind his wife Carlo and a young son and daughter; and
